NUMed takes pride in developing the next team of well-rounded medical professionals in the era of digital health.

Nurturing all-round med students

STUDENT activities are a great way for you to explore your passions and interests outside of academics.

Furthermore, these activities not only strengthen peer relationships in the present but are also an excellent way to enhance one's interpersonal capabilities, including leadership, presentation and stress management skills as well as teamwork, all of which could provide students with a distinct advantage stepping into the working world.

Newcastle University Medicine Malaysia (NUMed), the international branch campus of the world-class Newcastle University in the UK, provides outstanding medical education for students in Malaysia.

while emphasising active student involvement in extra-curricular activities as well.

This makes it an ideal destination for those who aspire to become well-rounded medical professionals.

According to NUMed chief executive officer and provost, Prof Chris Baldwin: "Medical studies have a reputation for being academically challenging, but that should not deter students from embracing university life fully."

In fact, the university takes pride in providing an environment that is conducive for the holistic well-being of its students.

NUMed has a vibrant Student Association that hosts a huge range of activities via a variety of clubs and societies.

The activities that were successfully carried out by the Student Association recently include NUMed's Cultural Festival that celebrated the rich diversity of the university's student body.

Students represented different countries of the world with the aim of educating their peers on cultural distinctions and the importance of collaboration and cooperation.

“Our student body is made up of a diverse population from all around the world – Dubai, Singapore, Maldives, Egypt, New Zealand and other countries,”

“Therefore, the Cultural Festival acts as an avenue for the students here to introduce and promote their respective cultures,” explained Student Association president, Dania Bassim.

“It was interesting to witness the harmony amid the diversity,” said Student Association vice president, Aiswarya Vasu who was overjoyed by the positive response received from the lecturers and students on the event.

Besides that, as the university upholds the status of a civic institution that looks forward to serving the community, NUMed also places a lot of focus on organising activities that allow students to engage with the local communities.

The recent Health Camp 2018 conducted by NUMed's clinical students with the assistance of the clinical staff is an example of this.

The camp carried the theme “Obesity”, which is a growing concern among Malaysians.

The dual-purpose event focused on giving back to the community while simultaneously preparing the next generation of medical professionals.

At NUMed, the emphasis on both academic excellence and extra-curricular activities offers the right mix for students to get the most out of their journey toward becoming a doctor.
